

DC Ranch Film Club to showcase ASU students' films

BY BRANDON CURTIS | RECREATION MANAGER

Since developing the DC Ranch Film Club three years ago, the Community Council has hosted private screenings of feature films and documentaries. This year the Film Club is providing young filmmakers a forum to showcase their efforts to film enthusiasts throughout the community.

The DC Ranch Film Club and the Center for Film, Media and Popular Culture at Arizona State University are excited to team up for the first ever DC Ranch Student Film Showcase.

"This unique opportunity for students to show and discuss their films provides them valuable experience as they continue their development in film making," said ASU Center's Director Peter Lehman.

Current ASU students and recent alumni were invited to submit short films for selection and viewing. Student filmmakers will be on hand to comment on their films and answer questions immediately following the screening.

The curated pieces will include a wide selection of films, including early class assignments to complete films that have already been accepted to festivals.

"The presentations will illustrate the journey of hands-on learning that ASU students receive while working towards their film degree and hopefully moving on to a career in the industry," said Cat Hartmann, faculty affiliate at the ASU Center for Film, Media and Popular Culture.

Focus, one of the short films to be showcased, was the capstone project for Matt Chesin during his senior year which involved a large group of student filmmakers. Focus has been accepted into several film festivals and received recognition for best narrative short and screenplay. Chesin, along with several other cast and crew, will discuss his experiences during and after filming this production.

"This showcase represents another great cultural partnership with DC Ranch," said Lehman.
